Summary

I wanted to travel the world but after seeing a small piece of it I got introduced to coding. For two years it was my hobby and I have been part of at least 2 interesting web development projects. Now it is my profession and even my way of life. I think I have analytical and problem-solving skills, as well as team working abilities, and they are some of my most valued competencies. All of this skills are helping me in my new hobby - fighting fake news and disinformation with OSINT!

STRENGTHS

---

- Flexibility

Reading more and more about science and human behavior I understood how important is to adjust yourself to every situation. Life is much easier that way. Working away from home, on cruise ships with 60+ nationalities onboard, helped me achieve that. Seeing so many different cultures, successfully working in the same environment was a great experience.

- Questioning

The key for good communication between people is to ask questions. We can never know what exactly the other person thinks but we can always ask. We wouldn't have this civilization if humans didn't ask questions about how nature works.

- Organization, Strategy and Willpower

Always eager to learn something new, I've done dozen of courses online, which helped me optimize my time and stop procrastination.

Achievements

- I did a skydiving jump from 14 000 feet over Honolulu, Hawaii.
- I've traveled around the world. I've been in more than 100 different cities around the world in more than 30 countries, on 4 continents. According to TripAdvisor.com I have 121,067 (I am sure they are more than that) total miles traveled.
